There is little left to tell. James Harding slowly returned to life under the nursing of his faithful wife, for such she had ever been. The brother, as the physician predicted, never regained his mental vigor, although he remained a harmless member of the Harding household, which is again the house of peece. Harding were young and devotedly at-tached to each other. Their married life had been unruffled by the usual Before their marriage Mary had been a workgirl in the establishment in which hold, which is again the home of peace and love after its night of tragedies.

workgirl in the establishment in which her husband was a partner, and he had married her solely for her worth of character, for she was poor and had, she said, no relatives.

One afternoon James Harding took a late train for home, business having detained him beyond his usual hour. He entered a carriage and sat down on a seat already partly occupied by a handsome, well-dressed man of perhaps thirty. He had crisp, black hair and moustache, quick, keen eyes and a delicate aquiline profile, but the firm expression of his square, resolute jaws was at variance with the expression of the upper part of his face. His hands were very white, but large; and, although he wore no rings, and carried his gloves instead of wearing them, his finger-nails were well when a larger of the standard or wearing them. shaped and exquisitely clean. He had the bearing of a rather flashy gendleman. They did not exchange a word until the train, gathering speed as it rushed on, had covered a good deal of ground on its route. Then only a few casual remarks passed.

Harding reached home, kissed his wife, had dinner and sat down to read the evening paper. It was not until he had done all this that he noticed anything unusual about his wife. Then he saw that she was pale and that she showed signs of nervousness. As she went from the room a moment she dropped upon the floor a slip of paper. Harding picked it up and read as follows:

DEAR MARY—I shall be in your summer-house at 10° clock to night. If you love me do not fail to be there. Do not let your husband suspect or we shall be rained.

James Harding had never been jealous of his wife, simply because he had never suspected her of any indiscretion; but now his brain seemed on fire. He mediated upon the situation as coolly as he was able, but could not determine what to do. Upon one thing, however, he was determined. He would track the pair to their trysting-place. He threw the note back on the floor, and pretended to read his paper. His wife soon returned, picked up the note and hastily thrust it into her pocket.

Ten o'clock came. Mary slipped out, but hardly had she reached the summer house before her husband had secreted himself near enough to see and hear all. He saw, first, a man start up from a rustic seat as his wife approached—the very man who had come down in the train—and then he saw them clasped in each other's arms.

"Dear Edgar," Pasaid she after the words of greeting were over, "precious as this meeting is to me, we run a fearful risk. Should my husband discovery ou lier, and the point of the production of the new forms a rustic seat as his wife approached—the very man who had come down in the train—and then he saw them clasped in each other's arms.

"Dear Edgar," said she after the words of greeting were over, "precious as this meeting is to me, we run a fearful risk. Should my husband discover you here, what would become of us?"

Harding could stand no more. He grasped the first weapon that presented liself—a heavy garden spade—and, beside himself with fury, rushed upon the man. A terrible blow felled him to the ground, where he lay motionless. A scream from Mary brought several persons to the scene. The husband, scarcely comprehending what he had done, went to his room. The body of his victim was carried into the house and doctor was sent for. He came and examined the ghastly wound, while Mary, pale and trembling, waited, but dared not ask for his decision.

"Has he friends here?" asked the doctor.

"No, he has no friend but me," she is organized to give prefect satisfaction.

The doctor paused, looking compassionately down upon the deathly white face on the pillow. Then he began to bandage and dress the cruel wound, "But you haven't told me your decision, doctor," exclaimed Mary, presently. "How soon must he die?" declared the doctor, cutting ruthlessly away the locks that were matted about the wound, and laying his strips of plaster upon the bare skull. "He will not die."

When James Harding entered his bedroom his brain was dazed with the tragedy in which he had borne so im-portant a part. He threw himself upon the bed, but not to sleep. The weight of his crime did not so much oppress him as the thought that his wife had been untrue to him. Throughout his married life no breath of suspicion had been entergained by him; and the tear-

A new labor organization has been formed recently in this city. It will hold its first meeting on the first Sunday in May and will be known as the Knights of Labor Trades Council. There are ten intional district assemblies represented in this city, such as the clothing cutters, machinists, iron and steel workers, etc., and in order to make them work hormoniculy it was found advisable to organize the councils. The leaders claim that the council will be able to muster 20,000 on the labor holday in September next, and that it will succeed in strength and influence the somewhat delapidated trades assemblies.
